

FREE SELLER'S GUIDE

The Seattle Home Seller's Roadmap

A Complete Step-by-Step Guide to Selling With Confidence in 2026

CHRISTINE & COMPANY | POWERED BY eXp REALTY

QUICK ANSWER

The Seattle home selling process begins with an honest pricing strategy and pre-listing preparation, moves through marketing and offer negotiation, and closes at escrow — typically 45 to 75 days from the decision to sell through closing. Preparation, not luck, is what produces a clean sale.

Step One: Get an Honest Valuation — Not an Automated Estimate

Automated home value tools are convenient, but they are frequently wrong by a meaningful margin, especially in Seattle where views, lot orientation, and micro-neighborhood dynamics can shift value significantly within a few blocks.

Work with an advisor who will tell you the number the market will actually support. Overpricing is the single most common reason a well-located home sits unsold.

Step Two: Decide What to Fix — and What to Leave Alone

Not every repair pays for itself at resale. Cosmetic issues that create a negative first impression are almost always worth addressing before listing. Structural or systems issues uncovered by a pre-listing inspection are worth fixing or disclosing clearly.

A pre-listing consultation should give you a clear, prioritized list based on what actually moves value in your specific price tier and neighborhood.

Step Three: Stage and Photograph the Home Properly

In a market where most buyers begin their search online, photography is the first showing. Professional photography and staging materially change how many buyers request a tour.

The goal is a buyer's ability to imagine themselves in the space within the first few seconds of a photo or a walkthrough.

Step Four: Price and Launch Strategically

A property that launches with strong initial marketing and a price grounded in real data tends to generate the most attention — and often competing offers — in its first days on market.

Your advisor should walk you through how comparable homes have performed recently and how to structure the listing so it draws serious interest from the start.

Step Five: Evaluate and Negotiate Offers

The highest offer is not always the best offer. Financing strength, contingencies, proposed timeline, and buyer flexibility all factor into which offer actually serves your interests.

Your advisor should present a clear comparison of all material terms — not just price — so you can negotiate from a position of full information.

Step Six: Navigate Inspection, Appraisal, and Closing

Once under contract, the buyer will typically conduct their own inspection and may request repairs or a price adjustment based on findings.

Washington is a non-attorney closing state — a title and escrow company manages document signing, transfer of funds, and recording, typically 30 to 45 days after mutual acceptance.

Common Mistakes Seattle Sellers Make

Pricing based on what you need rather than what the market supports almost always leads to a longer time on market and a lower eventual sale price.

Skipping pre-listing preparation to save time frequently costs sellers more in negotiated repairs and price concessions than the preparation would have cost upfront.

The sellers who have the smoothest experience in Seattle's market are not always the ones with the biggest home or the highest asking price — they are the ones who prepared thoroughly, priced honestly, and worked with an advisor who told them the truth from the very first conversation.

Ready to move from planning to listing?

Christine Andreasen | (206) 353-8787 | christine@candco.me | www.christineandreasen.com